beneficial? In the right situation, it is beneficial to plant xeric species as they tend to benefit from lack of water, but what if it is a bit too dry? What is the additional benefit of keeping xeric species? A: Xeric species will generally outperform mesic species in a limited water environment, with some exceptions that aren't plant-related. When water is plentiful, they may be out-competed by mesic species. One thing that makes xeric plants more helpful in a water deficit environment is that they typically have a lower density. In a dry climate they will be more spread out, exposing more surface area to the sun and being closer to the surface where the water is. From a biocultural standpoint, you can see this as freeing up plant material to use as food for pollinators. The lower biomass density means less competitively overgrazing by a human population. For specific examples of this, see Douglas-fir in California, Ginko biloba in California, and Quercus in New Mexico. A: My experience in the Western mountains of the American west where humidity is generally low, moisture-loving plants are mixed with fire-tolerant plants. We use fire-tolerant plants such as trees and shrubs to create a new habitat for wildlife after over-cooking our mountains with invasive timber and non-forest producing
