Effect of monocrotaline on rabbit lung function. Monocrotaline, a pyrrolizidine alkaloid, is reported to be a direct pulmonary carcinogen in rodents. As there is no information about the effects of monocrotaline on human lungs, in the present study we examined the effect of monocrotaline on rabbit lung function. Four groups of New Zealand rabbits were treated with three different doses of monocrotaline (0.2, 0.5, and 1 mg/kg body wt, by single intratracheal administration), and another group was given saline solution by similar procedure. Monocrotaline significantly elevated the lactate dehydrogenase activity in serum and markedly increased the concentrations of protein, lactic acid dehydrogenase, and gamma-glutamyl transpeptidase in bronchoalveolar lavage fluid. Monocrotaline markedly depressed the level of ATP in lung tissue. Monocrotaline also caused significant decreases in lung volume as measured by a Boyle's law technique; time constant of the deflation curve was prolonged in lung fields exposed to the highest dose of monocrotaline. These observations indicated that monocrotaline causes noxious effects on rabbit lung function and morphology. We will use your email address only for sending you newsletters.
