Please Note: Some of the brushes and tools described here are only available in CS4 and CS5. Adobe Photoshop brushes How to use brushes to change the color of a photograph The most basic brush in Photoshop is the Color Brush. It's really easy to use, and can be used to quickly change a color in an image. To make a Color Brush, choose Color from the Brush drop-down menu and select a color from the palette. To add more colors to the brush, you need to change the brush type and the brush size. Adding multiple colors When you add multiple colors, the Brush Tool selects adjacent pixels together. This means that the selected pixels will be the color of the brush you've selected, and all surrounding pixels will be transparent. The more colors you add, the larger the selection will be. To add multiple colors, hold Shift while you click and drag from a color to another, keeping the Shift key pressed. This allows you to select a color range that is much larger than just a single color. Check out our animation showing how the Color Brush can be used to quickly change a photo's colors. You can select colors from the Tools Options dialog box by clicking the Brush Type drop-down menu, and selecting from the palette that appears. You can also choose a color from an image and select a brush size from the Brush Size menu, or enter a new size in the Brush Size dialog box. You can also select a brush type from the Brush Type menu. Adding brush type and size The Brush Types menu includes several other useful options. By default, a color brush is selected, but you can also use a Gradient or Eraser brush. The Gradient brush lets you create the same effect as the Gradient menu by defining a range of colors, while the Eraser brush lets you erase all of the selected pixels using the Eraser tool. The Brush Size menu lets you set the size of the brush. Photoshop has a large number of brush options, including dots, bricks, and freeform styles. You can also use image pixels as a brush size. The Quick Selection Brush lets you quickly select an area and fill it with a color. Choose Quick Selection from the Brush drop-down menu, and then select a color from the palette. Shifting colors with the Dodge tool The Dodge tool changes the colors of the pixels that it selects.
